

Abstract

A termination circuit changes impedance to match a transmission line impedance.

The change is made after a signal driver applies a signal through the termination circuit to the transmission line but before a signal reflection returns from an end of the transmission line.